Executive Summary. Managers have discovered that it makes a lot of sense to use an innovation to generate innovation. So they are experimenting with the potential of artistic interventions: bringing in people, practices, and products from the arts to help address issues their organizations are facing. Organizations of all sizes and all sectors in Europe have tried artistic interventions—for many reasons and with all kinds of art forms.

Barry and Meisiek propose a typology of “workarts”, namely art collection, artist-led intervention, and artistic experimentation (2010: 1507), which corresponds to the threefold characterization in our definition of artistic interventions, namely processes bringing people, practices, and products from the world of the arts into the world of organizations. In practice, the typological differentiations from the literature are blurred and activities often combine two or three of these elements.
