One of the weakest areas of a zone is the free-throw line. When the ball is at this position, the player with the basketball has many options to attack the defense. Nearly every time I watch a team play against a zone they put their center at the free-throw line in this position without even considering other options.

When it comes to attacking regular half-court zone defenses, Coach K prefers to attack in a simple manor. Many people feel like they must run a different offense based on the zone defense. At Duke, however, the team runs just one offense against all zone defenses. A familiar offense against multiple defenses keeps your players more instinctive.
